Ronel Blanco, pitcher of the Houston Astros and Whitney and pilot of the MLB team received a suspension for 10 games after a sticky substance was found on his glove during a game against the Oakland Athletics on Wednesday.

The pitcher was ejected before the fourth inning after the umpires found a "foreign substance" during a routine check.

Michael Hill, senior operations manager on the MLB field announced the suspension on Wednesday. Blanco was also fined an undisclosed amount.

"Unless appealed, Blanco's suspension will take effect tonight when the Astros begin their series against Oakland. If the player chooses to appeal, the suspension will remain in effect until the appeal process is complete", said a MLB statement to local media (MNB).

According to MLB.com, Blanco said he had resin on his left hand because he was using it to grip the ball.

Players can use sweat and resin, which helps grip the ball, but any foreign substance is illegal in MLB.

Dana Brown, Astros general manager said to reporters that Blanco initially wanted to appeal the decision but then decided not to.

"This is an umpire's call. He felt that there were some sticky substances on his glove that he couldn't see, but they told him he was suspended for that", said Brown to The Guardian's News.

"Ronel Blanco is a good human being, he was a good person and worked hard to get into the rotation."

"I think he sees it as: 'Look, I don't want to be out there. I just don't want to be out there any longer and go back to work'."

contacted the Astros for more comments.

In 2024, MLB introduced a new rule that ejected players due to foreign substances can be suspended for 10 days.
